Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER X TIREE--DUNS, OR ANCIENT FOKTS Class A The Semi-broch Type1 It may be bold to introduce a new name in our description of the Tiree Duns, but a type seems to occur here which is not only distinct from the ruder Hill-Forts, but apparently also from the true Brochs (or so-called Pictish Towers) of the northern counties of Scotland, and of the Orkneys and Shetlands. 8 This class consists of substantial circular or sub-circular drystone erections enclosing a central space some 35 to 40 feet in diameter. The wall, which now never exceeds about six feet in height, has within its thickness a passage or ground gallery, more or less continuous, and varying from 28 to 36 1 These, in their doable walls, bear some resemblance to the Irish Cashels, which, however, are very much larger in area, and seem in some cases...
